ATP HANGZHOU

WEATHER AND COURT CONDITIONS

This is a different story to Chengdu. It's hot, really hot. Temperatures climb from 29 degrees on Tuesday to 35 on Friday, with humidity around 73%. That combination is brutal. The balls get heavy, the grip gets wet and the legs go. Anyone who isn't fully fit will be exposed, not just in the third set but already in the second.

Court speed: 1.38 with a 13.2% ace rate, significantly faster than the tour average and one of the quickest hard courts of the season. There's no altitude here, Hangzhou sits pretty much at sea level, but the surface itself is quick enough.

Tuesday to Friday (rounds 1 and 2): Dry, sunny and getting hotter every day. This is where fitness decides matches. Long rallies in 32 to 35 degrees will cost players who aren't in shape, and I expect a few retirements or players falling apart late in matches.

Saturday (semis): Thunderstorms in the forecast. If they close the roof, Hangzhou turns into an indoor event, which makes it even quicker. That's where the big servers take over completely. Sunday to Tuesday calms down to around 30 degrees.

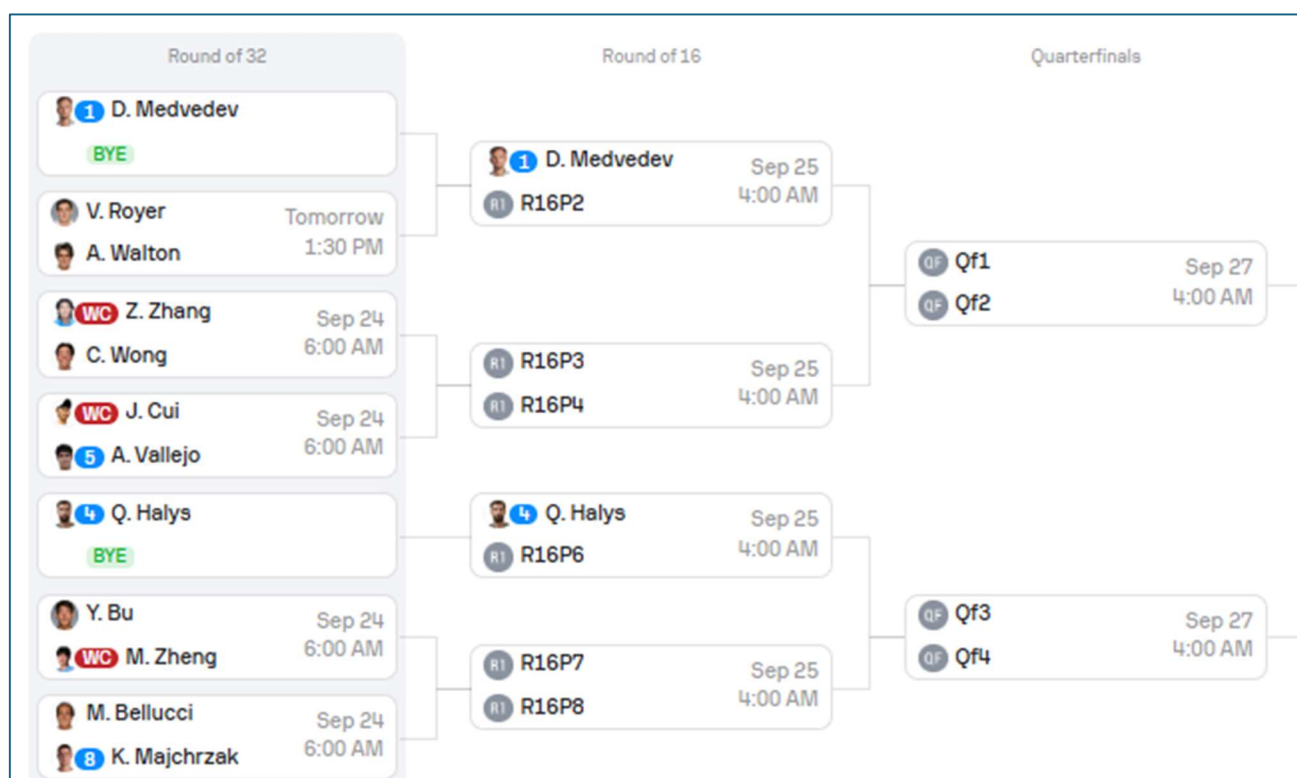

Who benefits: Big servers who win their service games quickly and save energy, like Atmane, Halys and Marozsan. Flat hitters who end points early, like Safiullin. Lefties, whose serve out wide is even harder to read on a court this quick, like Bellucci. Players who are used to heat and Asian conditions, like Shimabukuro and Hijikata, and the home players like Bu, Zhang and Wong, who have no jet lag and no climate to adjust to (but always be careful with these players, especially when the performance doesn't line up)

Who doesn't: Clay courters and grinders who need long rallies to build the point, like Faria, Vallejo and Majchrzak. Gaston's drop shot game gets punished on a court this fast. And anyone coming in tired: Faria has played around 75 matches this year and arrives from El Salvador, Vallejo is on a short turnaround from Lima. In 35 degrees, they'll suffer the most.

No BS takeaway: My focus stays on Chengdu this week, but Hangzhou has one position I'm watching. I don't like Rublev's short prices here. His level over the last months doesn't justify it, and a hot, fast court with no margin for error doesn't help him. Atmane is looking like a good sport. He has played less this year, loves the Asian swing and has the serve for this court. But he cramped at the US Open, and 35 degrees with high humidity is exactly where that can happen again. So I want to see him get through his first match comfortably before I back him.

Royer has a lot of points to defend after reaching the final last year, so the motivation is there. Medvedev is the top seed, but he's volatile, and I won't fade him blindly.

Gameplan:

We will have a big clash for Royer against Medvedev, as Royer will be very motivated to play here and has to defend a lot. Medvedev is extremely volatile and I have been way more profitable against him than with him the last 2-3 years. I expect a long game, if Royer has a decent performance here. On the upper draw I don't see anyone else troubling the winner of (Royer/Medvedev), maybe a surprising performance of Zhang.

On the lower part, I think Halys is quite superior, I do like Zheng tho, he got a wildcard, had a good performance at the US open and already has some kind of these here against Bu. He got a wildcard even though he is American.

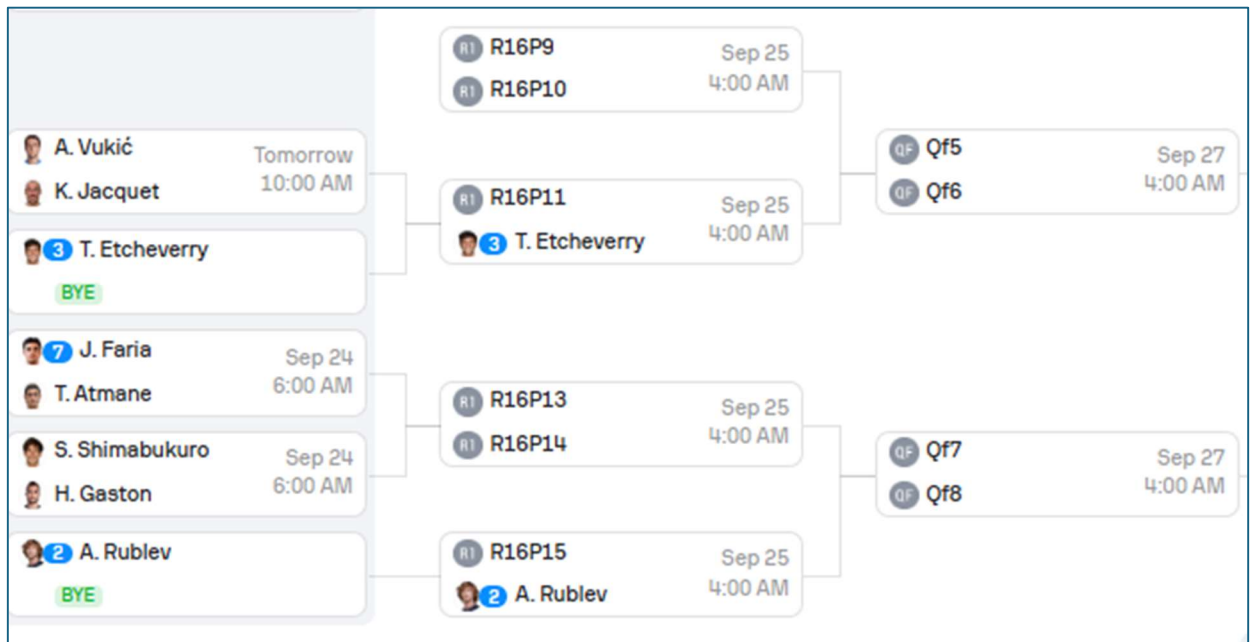

Projected Plays (only for premiums)

SET WIN [Blurred text]

WIN [Blurred text]

WIN [Blurred text]

Worth mentioning that the difference of the court will be quite extreme, so I am forecasting the better servers will struggle a little bit more, so the weather has to be watched.

Now here we got a interesting half, given that Rublev has always struggled with consistency since the Bublik/Rublev incident (all the day ones know), he hasn't been the same tbh, a no touch for me.

I like Atmane and Vukic here, they could could come through as a surprise here, Vukic is most of the times a dark hose to look out for and the conditions suit him

Other than that, I will be just watching the half with these bets:

WIN/SET WIN Rublev is Etcheverry 10.5 winning

WIN/SET WIN Rublev is Faria 10.5 winning (might be more because Rublev has been inconsistent)

In general, I will put 80% of my effort in ATP Chengdu, which is premium only, as we have higher quality plays and better external factors than in Hangzhou. DM me if you want to join or join directly in the APP
