

Gameplan from WaveHub

ATP TOKYO

WEATHER AND COURT CONDITIONS

We are starting this tournament beginning with tomorrow, and we expect extreme humid conditions, which will eventually slow down the surface speed significantly. To be honest, that is what we are seeing every year here. Additionally, they have just announced a typhoon warning, which could eventually push out the schedules, allowing more rest for players with long travels and qualifier game (like Fils, Tsitsipas)

Court speed: 1.2 with a 11.2% ace rate, slower than the first 250s we have had in the last week. There's no altitude here, Tokyo sits pretty much at sea level, but the surface itself is quick enough, and meanwhile we have to see the official numbers yet, the speed looks pretty much the same like last year.

Wednesday to Sunday (rounds 1 and 2, QF): Rain on Wednesday which is also pushing my thesis of travelled players being benefitted here from the typhoon. After that games look to be played Thursday through Sunday. All in all very humid, and I would give the edge to players who typically do well here (Alcaraz,

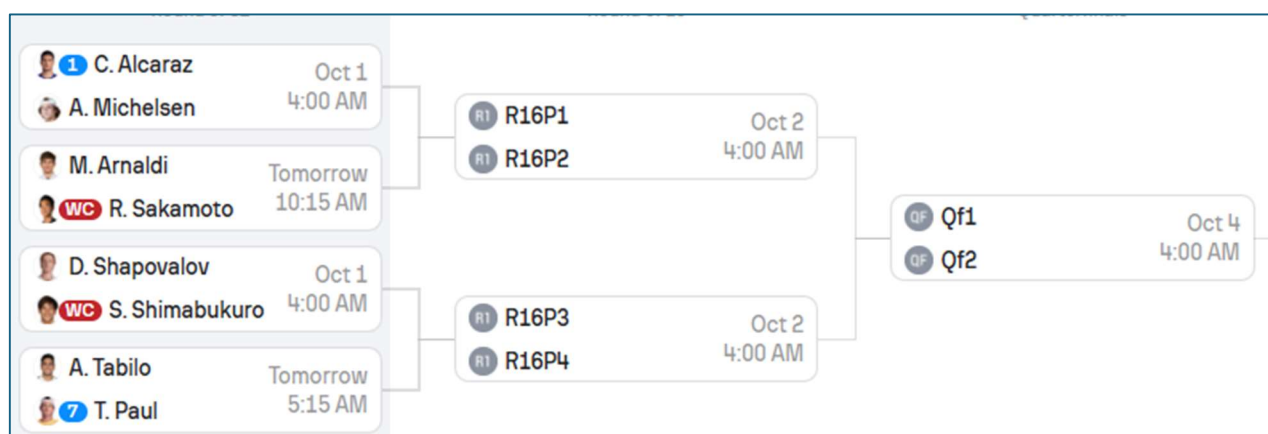

Saturday through Monday: Again delays, high humidity and in general bad weather. Expect delays in the final stages of the game

Who benefits: Big servers are generally doing well but it has way less of an impact. In terms of court conditions, Tokyo is a bit faster than the US open courts and slower than Hangzhou/Chengdu (what we have just experience)

Who doesn't: Servebots and in general the Asian Swing has been very selective of the players. A lot of players don't even have a shot anymore for the finals and are going for their vacations, player Paris and Shanghai as they are the biggest tournaments. But for the smaller wants, most of the players

Conclusion: I will likely focus more on Tokyo as we have more interesting setups, but for both tournaments there are some really nice matches so I expect a lot of opportunities to bet on.

Gameplan:

On the top draw we already have a more or less clear part. Let's start with the top one. Alcaraz is set to defend his title here, the conditions suit him perfectly and his outright is currently at 1.75 to win the tournament. From a logical standpoint, no one can trouble him here, not even close, except a Fils.

In this Quarter however we have Michelsen, who has a lot of momentum coming out of the US open, but it's just a different level of Tennis. If we don't see a complete upset and L performance from Alcaraz here, I can't see him losing to Arnaldi & Paul.

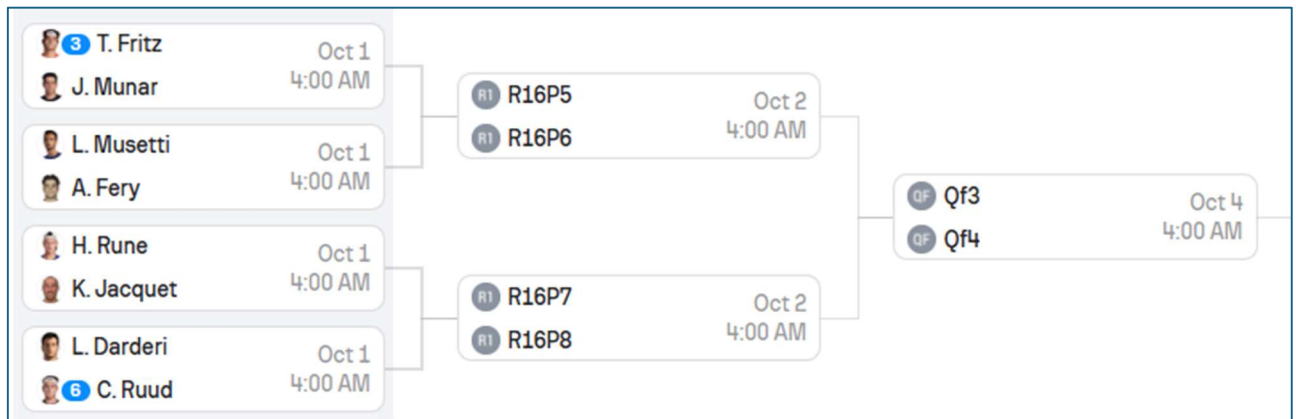

Only interesting match we could get here is Shapovalov vs Paul, usually Paul does not perform really good here (3-2 record), but if we see a good first match here, I might be entering on Paul, since Shapovalov has to play back 2 back tournaments and usually doesn't handle them that well. So, good performance from Paul, jetlagged Shapovalov = Win Paul (only with confirmation of the data). Otherwise the only thing that could be interesting is Quarterbet on Alcaraz, but the current odd (1.41) is just way too low, but we have more interesting quateres anyway.

Projected Plays

WIN Quarter Alcaraz ~1.8 (Usually, 1.8 would be a good bet, considering he is just coming back – too low)

WIN Paul vs Shapovalov ~1.7-1.8 Opening (This could be a doable odd. Shapo has a good run, but I would need to see a good first round from Paul to trust him here)

Worth mentioning that the difference of the court will be quite extreme, so I am forecast the better servers will struggle a little bit more, so the weather has to be watched.

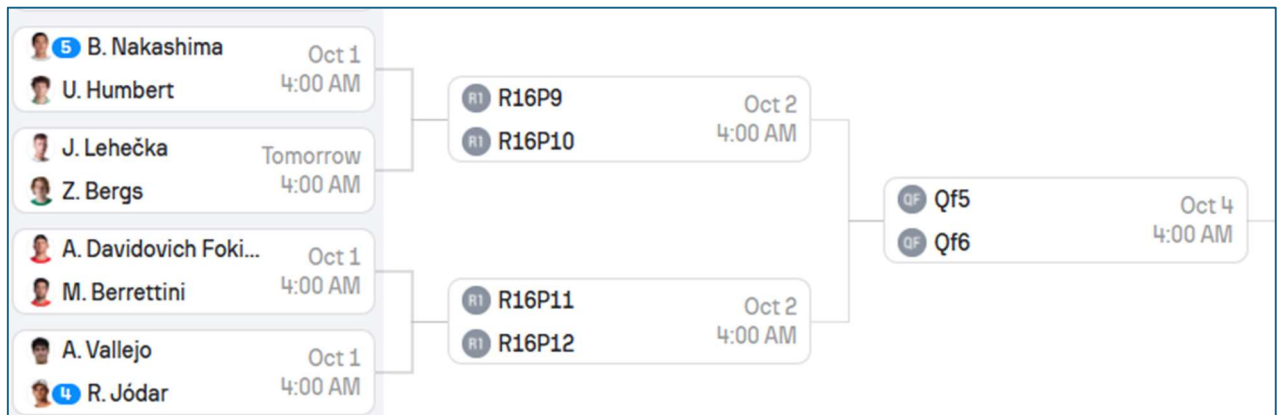

Nice Quarter here, Fritz obviously favourite at 2.3, although he remains a question mark after that US Open performance, but I believe we will see a good Fritz here as he tends to perform here quite good (final last year). I would rather fade Musetti here against Fritz with logical reasoning: Musetti came back from an injury, had 2 mediocre tournament runs losing back to back to Jodar and was outclassed by higher tiered opponents like Tiafoe. On top of that, retirement against Sweeny at US Open. Add to that, he has pretty poor performances at the Asian Swing (Besides 23,24 Chengdu). You see where everything's pointing at. If Fritz gets his serve right in the first round, I would take a 1.7 any day here.

Bottom is also really exciting, we got Rune back. He already played 2 matches at the Laver Cup and was looking decent, but hard to bet blindly on him here. I believe he is gonna do well as he usually does well in this part of the season, but of course, we have the return-from-injury factor, which we cannot calculate. Against Ruud however, who has not shown any signs of peak performance since Rome this year, it might be possible to bet at a very good odd. I'm talking like 2.5 upwards, and even then probably only the set.

Other than that, I will be just watching the half with these bets:

WIN Fritz vs Musetti ~1.7 opening

WIN/SET WIN Rune vs Ruud ~2.5 opening (might be lower because Ruud has been inconsistent)

The 3rd Quarter is open, Humbert typically does well in the later part of the season, but with his recent losses, I don't have high hopes on him tbh. Looking at the court speed and bounce, this might suit Nakashima perfectly and I feel like we will see a way more consistent version of him, He will already have a strong test against Lehecka/Bergz, which he should manage, after that it will likely be Jodar, and I have already stated this in the free group, but I am looking to fade Jodar here.

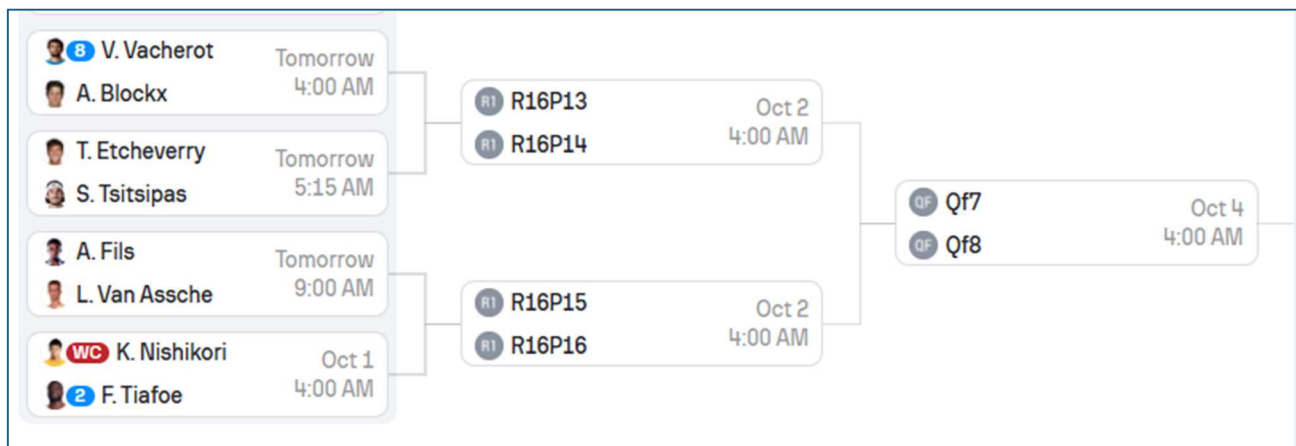

Most of the time I bet on him but in the race to turin, he would want to do his best, but the bookies see him as a clear favourite everytime, making him really valueable to fade. So you would just have to wait for the right moment. I don't think he will make Semis here.

For Fokina and Berettini it will be interesting, how well Fokina can play Back 2 Backs, usually you would fade him, but against an Berrettini that is known to struggle physically in a area this humind, I would still give the first round to Fokina if he manages his energy, but no later than Jodar.

Other than that, I will be just watching the quarter with these bets:

WIN Nakashima vs Jodari ~2 opening

WIN Jodar vs Fokina ~1.8 opening

What a quarter guys, damn. Just look at the names: Tsitsipas AND Fils are in the same draw (both as QFs). Now this Quarter is STACKED with talent. Let's start from the beginning. Blockx is coming back from a retirement, he was kinda struggling but fought through Cerundolo and eventually retired against Khacha.

Other than that, he was really positive and has just a really good baseline game you can rely on. For Vacherot, I don't have high hopes on him, a lot of errors and he still has every reason to get points here, but in my opinion, he really was just a one hit wonder at Shanghai last year against Rinderknech (who remembers that final?), I doubt that he will reproduce a Masters or 500s win. I would fade him here IF he comes through here against Blockx (for whatever reason, likely not)

Fils has already 2 games played here and looked not the sharpest to be honest. I was watching the games and the outrights closely and I was really, really close taking the 7.5 quarter win on blocks, but given the question mark on the half, I did not take it, even though there is a lot of value on it, maybe we will take a 5 in the next round.

For Tiafoe, I don't have high hopes on him either, a little different court to the US open and logically he should be performing well here, before I play anything on or against him, I need to see the level he brings first, as the sweating in high humidity is really something to look out for

WIN/Quarter Bet Blockx ~7,5/5 opening

WIN/ SET WIN Tiafoe vs Fils ~2.2 opening

Of course during the tournament, we will adjust our choices and bets, but for now this is what we see in ATP Tokyo.